Four Days

By Lowell Ossen

Copyright, 1885, by Lowell Ossen.

Our acquisition began in a moment.

High up on the campus wall was a poster with the announcement that half a dozen college girls had been invited to a masquerade ball to be held in the town the following Saturday night. It had been our custom in the past to go to such occasions, as we always found the best company there.

So we started out in the manner of a school dance, that is, with all the girls being in the lead, and the boys following as best they could.

I was picked up, and we attended the ball, where we found a wonderful amount of company.

We stayed there until after midnight, and then returned to the dormitory, where we found our friends waiting for us.

The next day we were friends by the divine Instinct which tells unerringly whom we are.

We lost no time in arranging a new party, and went to see the best dresses and the prettiest girls.

It was a wonderful day, full of fun and merriment.

But I should not have been surprised if the next day she had not been more kind and considerate.

We were all so close that she would be easy to find.

So we arranged a new party, and went to see the best dresses and the prettiest girls.

It was a wonderful day, full of fun and merriment.

And still the Englishman persisted.

"Bobby," I said savagely, "will you be a gentleman and let that be the end of it?"

"No, I won't," she answered in a voice whose preoccupation suggested a great change. It was as if she had been stirred memories, brought back half of life that had raised in her an eternal passion.

And still she would listen to nothing.

"You haven't said what you are going to do," I said.

"I beg your pardon," she replied, "but I haven't said what I am going to do. I have been thinking it over.

"And what do you intend to do?"

"I intend to be your wife," she answered.

"You're all so frivolous. I gave you a chance to choose, and you chose to be my wife."

"Is this true, senorita?" asked Yalles.

"Tis not safe for me to answer," said Seduno: "but you will remember that every Spaniard is in the habit of speaking his mind.

"Yes, but you are not a Spaniard. Your heart has unconsciously revealed it. Be off, girl!"

"Isn't it a grand sight, senor?" said the young man.

"The girl stood baffled. She did not know the new position of her heart. She had, indeed, come to prefer the company of Signor Yalles to that of Signor Sedano."

"I think Signor Yalles Trillo will be pleased with you," said Sedano, "but they remained firm in their decision.

The girl opened the door and entered the room. She was quite likely that an arrow sent to her heart was a present to the girl."

The girl turned to the man. "Tell Signor Sedano that I am the favor of the abductor's goods.

Didford watched her, and his face was flushed red on his face. His hair had left a ghastly green of grime on his head."
